Retired after more than sixty years of study, research and teaching at Harvard University, Prof. Richard N. Frye is now engaged in lectures and promoting Iran. Living in the Near East and Central Asia has given him a much broader view of the area than merely study and the reading of books. Also as an employee of Afghan, Iranian and Tajik governments, rather than simply a member of a foreign institution, or as a tourist, has been a unique experience, shaping his views of lands and peoples. His writings reveal an intimate knowledge not only of the past of those areas where Iranian people live, but also an understanding of the present. In a reversal of the usual maxim, he says that in order to understand the past one must study the present.

In his last visit to Iran in June, 2004, Professor Frye received a lifetime achievement award from Mamoud Afshar Foundation. A visit to Isfahan secured the approval of city and provincial officials to be buried in an existing mausoleum on the banks of the Zayandeh Rud river. In his own words, Professor Frye writes: “But I shall continue writing and speaking about “Greater Iran” until my time comes.”
